

Moore's Law has now stopped being true: transistors have become so small (Intel is currently working on readying its 10nm architecture, which is the anatomically small size) that simple physics began to block the process.